Who was Frantz Fanon and what is his legacy today? Documentary maker Hassane Mezine gives voice to men and women who knew the “flint warrior,” as Aimé Césaire called him, and shared with him special moments in struggle and also in a family and friendly context. Fanon died in December 1961, but his memory irrigated numerous revolutionary fields throughout the world. What view of this thinker and man of action do those who continue the fight today on different fronts against injustice and autocracy have of Fanon? The director takes the viewer on a journey, from the homeland to the hubs of political and social struggles, passing through the land where Fanon rests. Activists from around the world talk of their struggle and reflect on their rapport with Frantz Fanon. The transmission is thus established between the historical dimension and the diverse contemporary spaces touched by the Fanonian breath.

Organized by Colonialism Studies in the Consortium of Studies in Race, Colonialism, and Diaspora, with support from the Diversity Fund, Middle Eastern Studies, and the Center for the Humanities at Tufts.