

Excellence in Teaching

Faculty in the Department teach in four subfields: American Politics, Comparative Politics, International Relations, and Political Theory. Within the American subfield, our courses cover political institutions, public policy, mass political behavior and public opinion, and constitutional law. Policy specializations include environment, health care, immigration and language, and welfare. Our Comparative politics curriculum spans the globe. We offer courses on regional politics in Africa, East Asia, Latin America, Western Europe, and the Middle East, as well as courses that cross regional boundaries and emphasize general themes such as democratization, political economy, and state building. Our political theorists teach both ancient and modern political thought, including specialized courses on specific philosophers such as Machiavelli, Montesquieu, and Nietzsche. In these classrooms, students also face the enduring questions of political philosophy, questions relating to liberty and equality, justice, democracy, power, and morality. In the international relations subfield, our offerings cover national security policy, American foreign policy, international political economy, international law and organizations (Fletcher School faculty), and the relationship of domestic to foreign policy. We also teach courses on regional issues of international relations, in the Middle East, Africa, and Europe in particular.
